Aldermanic hearing

Apartment plan in Highlands area draws opposition

By ROBERT MCENNEL

Last night's hearing on proposed zoning changes was attended by fewer persons and generated less sharp debate than most before Louisville's Board of Aldermen in the past, but there were strong differences of opinion on the issue in several cases.

Perhaps the most controversial of the cases presented at the hearing of the city's planning and public works committee involved a lot on the north side of Fourth Avenue, The land, in Louisville's Highlands, was owned by the Louisville Housing Authority. It is a large, deteriorating 81-year-old house.

Mayor Cory, regarding that the money to be used to build the apartments would be used instead to renovate the house at 817 and 819. She said that the money to be used to build the apartments would be used instead to renovate the house at 817 and 819. Cook would let states spend on transportation

By CHRIS HADBLE

U.S. Sen. Marlow W. Cook said last night he supports a system of apportioning for the nation's transportation needs that would put the major decisions in the hands of state and local officials instead of federal bureaucrats.

CAAC is asked to help city seek U.S. funds

Representatives of the neighborhood council of the Louisville-Jefferson County Community Action Commission (CAAC) were asked to assist in seeking federal money for the city's economic development program.

In another case last night, H. Benja Lawrence, representing Louisville Architects, explained the firm's request for $750,000 to build a three-story office building on the southeast side of Gardner Lane about 600 feet east of Newburg Road.
