and contest sponsored by the Mining Enforcement and Safety Administration (MESA) at the U.S. Department of the Interior.

"These simulated mines were set up at Fairgrounds for the two-day biennial 'World Series of Safety'."

Originated in 1957 for the purpose of simulating rescue, in mine safety.

The contest draws miners from companies in 12 states who work to solve one and a half-hour problems in simulation of mine rescue techniques.

Most of the contestants probably will never see the gas masks, crowbars and foot and equipment which filled the competition area yesterday in a real mine disaster.

a rescue exercise. "These men were willing to take risks to help their fellow miners. If they think they can help someone, they're on hand to help them."

Mark said most were involved in mine rescue operations and are in excellent physical condition. "They have to be in the work involved," he said.

Other, more experienced men observe rescue and assist directed to the mine side the mine. Many of the young participants in the contest will go on to become mine rescuers.

While their primary concern is a mine disaster would be to locate any survivors, participants in the rescue contest must successfully complete a number of other tasks. Judges, most of them mine safety inspectors, monitor the team's movements carefully during the contest.

Competition is based on the time required to complete a problem and the successful application of rescue techniques in solving the problem and rescuing victims.

The members of the teams must meet all conditions in the mine, including
